

End of Story

February 12, 1999 will be a day that will go down in history as a day of infamy, the day that America officially lost its soul.

“Today’s decision by the United States to acquit President Clinton for the crimes of perjury and obstruction of justice makes a mockery of our nation’s long history of equal justice under the law, which is the bedrock of our justice system. With their verdict today, the Senate has set the President above all other Americans and left him unaccountable for his illegal actions. The implications of this decision will leave a permanent scar on our nation’s history and the rule of law that will take many years to overcome.”

This decision has officially shown that we are no longer a righteous people, a nation under God, a nation whose founding principles are the “laws of nature and the laws of nature’s God”. As the New York Times reported, this decision will have serious impact upon our children, our educational and political system from which we may never recover. We have chosen the slippery slope to Gomorrah. We are a nation adrift of moral principles. Our leaders have proven themselves to be the blind leading the blind. Moral outrage would be in vogue if America still had a moral majority. The fact that it does not is an even greater barometer of our moral decadence. We have met in a great battlefield testing whether this nation or any nation so conceived and dedicated can long endure. With widespread deceit, immorality, abortion, and cover-ups at the highest levels, trickling down to the lowest, it may not. America was great because America was good. It is no longer either. Today America officially lost its soul. I weep for my country.
